LOVELY WOMAN.

How She Captured an Elderly Denver Millionaire.

The Fine Point Involved in the Suit to Secure Possession of His Money Now That He Is Dead.

The special dispatch which appeared in THE GAZETTE of Monday from New York outlining the romantic story in which a Spanish beauty figure as the claimant for $3,000,000 left by a Denver millionaire, has in it many points of interest familiar to Denver residents of half a decade ago.

Yesterday a reporter for THE GAZETTE met a gentleman who lived in Denver until recently, and who was intimately associated with the parties who are most conspicuous in the story.

"William B. Daniels," said this gentleman, "was worth over $3,000,000 when he died in Denver a few days ago. He commenced life in New York as porter in a dry goods house, but by close economy and good business instincts he rose in the world, and when he went to Iowa he did a large business. Later he went to Denver, and in commercial pursuits his fortune grew rapidly. Eight years ago he was worth $1,500,000.

"The Donna Maddix first came to notice in Denver about 1880. She said she was from Boston, and that is probably correct, for she carried with her letters of introduction and recommendation to the best Denver families, letters that could only have been secured by living some time in Boston. She said that she was born in Cuba, and that is probably correct. She was about twenty-six years of age when she went to Denver.

"She was the most beautiful woman I ever saw. Her face was of a faultless Greek type, large dark eyes and a profusion of black hair. Her figure was simply perfection.

"Her manners were magnetic and fascinating. Whenever she appeared in a Denver drawing room she was sure to be surrounded by a throng of admiring men.

"She opened a school of oratory in Denver, and it soon became the most popular institution in that city. Every body went there. The donna was not an actress. She had the power to imitate an actress but she could not originate a role. In fact she had no originality, no intellectual development to speak of. Though her manners and conversation were charming, yet those who became intimate with her soon learned that her chief ambition was to become a millionaire, and beneath the beautiful skin was an aching void. There was no soul to the woman and very little intellect. She was little more than a beautiful chiseled statue.

"William B. Daniels, the millionaire merchant, had a young son by a former marriage. The young man, about twelve years of age, became a pupil of the fair Donna Maddix, and the latter met the teacher first in the way of business. They became intimate. The old gentleman must have been about sixty years of age, and the woman had the choice of marriageable men around Denver, but she chose the old man.

"Things went smoothly after the marriage for several months, when the husband, his infatuation dissolved, called a halt on his wife's extravagance. Her extravagance ran mostly in the way of dress. All her costumes were from Worth. She was without doubt the best dressed woman in America. Her expenses in this direction ran up into the thousands per month. Of course her husband could stand the amount, but he had been reared in the school of economy and he objected. He offered her an allowance of $500 per month, but she rejected the offer. They separated, and articles of separation were signed.

"The trial was undoubtedly the most sensational of any that has been held in this country for years."
